General Comments

On the afternoon of the monitoring visit, Group A and Group B were in their rooms participating in both planned activities and free choices.

Children in Group A were playing with the doll house and barbies, playing board games, Lego and creating art with foam stickers, glue and markers.

Group B's room had age-appropriate materials for the older afterschoolers and many were playing card games and board games.

Educators in both rooms remained engaged with the children taking interest in what they were playing. An educator could be heard using lots of enthusiasm when explaining the craft for the afternoon. It was Spy Week, so children were invited to make wanted posters. Tuesdays are also referred to as "Choose-Day" and the Program Manager had three different activities that children could choose to participate in towards the end of the day.

Communication among educators and program managers was strong and contributed to a smooth routine. Transition warnings were provided before clean-up time and going outdoors.

Educators were spread out in the outdoor space and conduct a visual inspection of the city playground at the beginning of the day and the end.
