General Comments

When licensing arrived on a PD Day, children were located in the main room and warehouse space. Many children were involved in board games and card games at the tables while other children were playing pool and table games. The second group of children were playing on the inflatables in the second space. One educator sat at one of the tables playing a game with children while observing children within the space. Two educators were present with each group of children maintaining the child-to-staff ratio.

The children were familiar with the schedule of the day with opportunities for gym time. When children entered the gym, they took a seat on the floor and educators counted children to ensure the correct number was present. The educators gave children a choice of games and took recommendations then deciding on the game with a show of hands. Licensing staff noticed the level of respect given to children to problem solve and independently choose what activities and group of children to engage with.

Licensing staff and the operator had a discussion regarding the new regulations. A recommendation was given to the operator to post children's names somewhere in the facility to nurture a sense of belonging however, it should be authentic to the program and its values. A recommendation was also suggested to have texts available in each room to build on children's literate identities and expand on their interests, curiosities, and questions. The operator mentioned previous informational texts and find-it puzzle books have been popular.
