General Comments

The children were getting ready for outdoor playtime when licensing staff arrived. Once half the children were ready, one educator took them outside so they wouldn't get too warm waiting for the others as they were dressed in their winter gear.
In order to go outside, the two-year-old children have to go down the stairs. The educators have taught the children to sit on the staid and slide down each step to help prevent the children from falling down the stairs.
While outside, the children were observed playing on the teeter totter, driving dump trucks around, raking leaves, marking on the chalk boards, relaxing in the hammock, breaking up pieces of ice, and cooking in the play kitchen. The infant children played in their playhouse and chased bubbles. The infants did not seem to the like the playground, so the educators took them for a walk around the yard and watched the vehicles drive by.
The classrooms are nicely organized with many natural materials and artwork such as tree branches and pinecones. The plants and soft lighting give the facility a cozy "home-like" feeling.
During the visit the educators were observed either sitting or squatting to the child's level when speaking to them. It was also noted that the educators offered choices to the children for activities to participate in.
There seems to be a good routine in the classrooms as seen during lunch time when the children were observed putting their water bottles and lunch bags on the shelf; Washing their face and hands and going to their cot for nap time.
Everything seemed to be running smoothly during the visit.
