General Comments
During outdoor play, children were observed collecting sticks and removing small weeds that resembled miniature carrots. Their actions demonstrated focused engagement with the natural environment. Educators reported that the children have recently shown a strong interest in insects and bugs, which appears to influence their exploratory behavior outdoors. Indoors, the learning environment contained a wide variety of materials that supported multiple developmental domains, including Art, Literacy, Building, and Dramatic play. A garden area was also present, offering opportunities for children to extend their interest in nature and insects into indoor learning experiences.
