General Comments

Licensing staff noticed how inquisitive the preschool children were as they wanted to know my name and asked why I was there. They were also eager to tell me their name and show off their tattoos. The children seemed to have developed a good relationship with the educator who appeared very sensitive to their needs. She easily changed direction with the children if they needed to. The children had snack, a circle time and then headed outside to play. Upon return, the educator advised licensing staff that the children are free to play where they want but she sets out invitations to play incase it draws the children's interests.

The children's belongings were organized on hooks with their names and photos. The 4-year-old room had an abundance of materials which included but was not limited to a kitchen, wooden blocks, bins with dinosaurs, magnets, sensory bin and craft supplies. There is also a place where the children can relax with books and have quiet time.

The school-age children started arriving by bus and it was noticeable that the educators have created a system to ensure that the children are accounted for. Educators were seen meeting the bus, counting the children and signing them in on the attendance sheets.

Once the children arrived, they were observed throughout the classroom making a ramp, playing with playdough and hanging out in the book area. It appears that routines have been established and the children are given a variety of choices to meet their needs.

A description of Mona Lisa was placed next to an area where the children could paint and create on the wall. The classroom is very organized with art materials, playdough, building supplies, sand, a science centre, and a large dramatic play area to name a few of the learning areas. There is an abundance of materials and supplies available to the children and after a discussion with the Director it became very obvious that materials and supplies complement the children's interests. For example, there was a science potion mixing centre because the children had been very interested in Harry Potter.

All documentation for licensing was easily verified by licensing staff. It is complete and organized. I can now
