General Comments

When QAM arrived in the morning, children were engaged in a painting experience using paper plates. Children independently explored the materials in a variety of ways, including mixing paint and applying paint to the paper plates and themselves. The experience reflected opportunities for child-led exploration and creativity.

Educators reported that children have demonstrated a sustained interest in dramatic play. During the observation, children were engaged in a variety of dramatic play scenarios, including pretend doctor, veterinarian, family, farm, and tea party play. These experiences provided opportunities for imaginative play, social interaction, and role development.

Educators were observed actively supervising, engaging with, and responding to children throughout the observation period. Interactions were positive, respectful, and supportive of children's participation in play experiences.

The parent information board was current and contained the required information. Staff-to-child ratios were maintained, and fire drill records were accurate and up to date at the time of the observation.
