General Comments When licensing staff arrived, one group of school age children were on the playground, and the second group was in the pool for morning swim training. The outdoor space provides lots of opportunities for play and children were viewed playing ball games, in the sandbox, eating snacks, playing on the play structure, and sitting eating snacks. Educators moved around the space talking with children and completing 15-minute checks of attendance. Educators checked attendance and called children's names when transitioning back into the building with one educator leading and the second at the end of the children. An educator was observed having a discussion with children regarding sharing during games. Licensing staff shared the observation with the administrator suggesting that problem solving with children may be more productive by beginning with an open-ended question instead of placing blame on an individual child. The administrator confirmed she has supported educators in asking open-ended questions and reminds educators that when repeated reminders to children are ignored or unheard by one educator, a second educator may be able to approach the situation in a different way.
