General Comments
Bumblebees: The children have been enjoying nature walks, including looking for colours and observing trains. The learning environment included invitations related to fall activities. QAM observed positive child guidance when an educator supported children in learning how to share materials. The educator remained engaged and attentive to the children throughout the observation. Dragonflies: The children were getting dressed to go outside. The educator provided assistance and support when needed while encouraging the children to complete tasks independently. While transitioning outdoors, the educator engaged the children in singing a song. The learning environment was clean and organized, with a variety of materials available and an invitation for a craft activity. Caterpillars: The children had recently returned from a nature walk and were washing their hands and using the washroom. The educator provided assistance as needed, including helping children change wet socks. The educator shared that the children have demonstrated an interest in nurturing and caring for others. These interests were reflected in their dramatic play, where children engaged in caring for babies and family-based play. Owlets and Grasshoppers: The children were observed outdoors engaging with push cars and playhouses. Educators identified the children's current interests as songs, mark-making, worms, and animals. Educators were observed to be attentive and engaged with the children. As the children began showing signs of tiredness before transitioning indoors for lunch, educators responded by holding and comforting them. Child-to-staff ratios were met at the time of the observation. The parent board was reviewed and found to be complete and up to date.
