General Comments

Upon my arrival to the early learning and childcare home, the operator introduced me to the children. One young preschool child who is nervous of strangers was comforted by the operator and the operator reassured her that I was a "friend", and it was okay that I was in the play space. The operator ensured all children knew my name and used the concept of friends, so the children understood why I was in their playroom.

The operator set out numerous activities and invitations for the children. The operator used the different activities to discuss concepts like shapes, colors, and numbers. She remained engaged throughout the morning and expands on the children's imaginative play. The children like to pretend they are in a rocket ship and the operator played along with the children. She followed their lead and encouraged children to participate in the activities but also respected if children wanted to play with something else.

When one child was missing their mom, the operator reassured the child that the day would go by fast and listed the daily routine of what was left in the day before the child's mom would return.

The indoor play space was clean and organized. Shelves have organized materials and furniture is placed to allow for gross motor play.

The operator used positive child guidance and when children wanted to use the same toy, the operator got down on the children's level and sat with them on the carpet to help them navigate sharing the toys and space.

Child files were checked and verified. All were complete.
