General Comments During the observation of Rooms 4 and 5, children were engaged in snack time and preparing for the transition outdoors. Educators reported that transitions with larger groups are managed by dividing responsibilities: one educator supports children finishing their snack while the other begins preparing those who are ready to go outside. Educators indicated that this method is effective in reducing congestion and supporting a smooth transition. Both rooms displayed extensive documentation of children's learning, including outdoor play, block building, playdough activities, and creating a tunnel in the snow. Invitations were available for sensory exploration, colouring, and early numeracy experiences. The learning environments in both rooms were well-equipped with materials supporting art, literacy, dramatic play, block play, and sensory activities. Outdoors, children were observed engaging with large snow piles and using the outdoor kitchen for dramatic play.
